Maybe the people taking the time to give me such a hard time. Maybe the people who are so disdainful of being called "hicks" by someone who has become so un-cool. Or maybe it's the fact that so much of the discussion, even on the CNN-moderated debate, has turned into a debate about immigration. I don't know. Most politicians seem to be saying that this is the central issue of the campaign.

I'm not so sure it is. Bernie Sanders, who was in Las Vegas Wednesday night, understands this. He was in Nevada on the weekend, stumping for delegate-seeking supporters of Martin O'Malley. In this campaign, Sanders has made immigration the central issue. It's not. He may have a point that it is, but there's a big difference in the ways immigration is talked about in the two parties. And this campaign is a litmus test of sorts for how to talk about immigration. The Republican Party is going to have to answer the question about whether it will ever get serious about immigration reform, which is an issue that is holding it back economically. The Republican Party will have to answer whether it is for "self-deportation." That's a pretty strong position. You can't get elected with that. It's going to have to answer whether it's for a path to citizenship, or if it's "self-deportation," whether
